Out-reach programmes.

Though there is no clear-cut definition of what social responsibility is, it can be defined as “the duty of each individual to act for the benefit of the society as a whole” or simply, “the act of giving to the less fortunate”.

Studies have shown that giving and participating in outreach programs increases the chances of living longer. Why is that? Through giving and volunteering, the act alleviates stress and helps manage stress levels. This also makes the person more socially active, which beats lying on your bed or sitting at your coach the whole day.

Not only are there emotional benefits, but the physical benefits are worth the effort. Relief from chronic pain, freedom from depression, and positive behavior are also associated as benefits of volunteerism and outreach programs. Therefore outreach programs for students are conducted frequently for the students to imbibe in them the sense of responsibility towards the society. These programs are conducted under the banner of NSS and department students associations. The community outreach programmes conducted by students include,

- Visit to orphanage for cleanliness drive, educational activities and serving by providing food/clothes/educational books
- Cleanliness drive in slum areas
- Voter awareness drive
- Child care drive
- Tree plantation drive
- Camping at a village for various activities.
- Blood donation camps
